But with the vast development of industry and the train of regulating functions of the national and municipal government that followed from it; ith the recent wast increase in taxstion, due to the war-the government has become through its relatiens to economic life the most potent force for maintenance or destruction ef eur American individualism.

"We found in the course of this development that equality of opportenity and its corollary, individual taitiative, was being throttled by the geocentration of control of industry and service, and thus an economic domination of groups builded over the nation. At this time, particularly, we were threatened with a form of autocracy of economic power. Our mass of regulation of sublic utilities and our legislation menument to our intent to preserve here gone a long way toward the gestions in the following words: shandenment of the 'capitalism' of Adam Smith.

"Day by day we learn more as to the practical application of restrictions against economic andd political femination. We sometimes lag behind in the correction of those forces that would override liberty, jurtice and equality of opportunity, but the principle is so strong within us that demination of the few will not be telerated."
